"Yes, on the left, yes." "Mr. Bartsch, you said that on Monday ... let's just say between five and seven ... you received an urgent telephone call?" "I received an urgent call. That's right, yes." "But this urgent call did not give you the address of the house where you were due to perform an emergency inspection." "That is correct." "Was the address given to you in code?" "No." "What does that mean?" "I do not recall exactly. The address was, however, in the neighborhood of the house. In other words, you know, I would have been able to look for the house immediately." "In the neighborhood of where?" "Near the house." "Near the house. In other words, you do not know whether it was the address of the house in question." "Had you not received a leaflet from the fire department with an address in the neighborhood where you were to carry out an emergency inspection?" "No, but I have in my files a list of emergency services. At the end of my route, I must have handed it to the driver. The driver then handed it to the station attendant." "That is what you call handing it to the driver?" "Yes." "The station attendant then gave you the leaflet with the address of the emergency inspection, is that correct?" "Yes, or no, the day before yesterday." "On the day before yesterday? What date was that?" "On the 21st." "And what did the station attendant say?" "The station attendant said that they were completely out of emergency inspection leaflets and they could only give me the list with the address of the next emergency inspection." "Mr. Bartsch, you are saying that you would not have had the address of the house in question had you not received a leaflet." "I do not think you should have received any such leaflet." "Why?" "I do not think the fire department would give you a list of emergency services. It is no longer required in all cases." "No, they must have sent me one." "That is not how it is 82157476af
